

The FCC plays a key role in upholding the moral values of the U.S. population. I believe that there is a point of balance between the first amendment to the Constitution and the morals of our society. I believe that we are currently on the wrong side of that balance point. There are many things that we could do to help ensure that individuals who are more easily influenced are protected from morally offensive materials. Some of these things include projects related to television such as the V-chip program, which seems to have failed not because of the technical aspects, but because programming materials have not been rated properly.

Please try to help your country by doing more to restrict morally offensive materials. I understand that this is subjective, but in this case it would be better to err on the side of moral caution than allowing everything under the guise of the first amendment.
